Recent advances in basic science clarify several important mechanisms of aging. The mechanisms identified are likely to serve as substrates by which heart function declines and predisposes elderly people to heart failure.Aging as a substrate of heart failure - ScienceDirectThe mechanisms identified are likely to serve as substrates by which heart function declines and predisposes elderly people to heart failure. One such mechanism is insulin/insulin-like growth factor (IGF)-1 signaling. Suppression of insulin/IGF-1 signaling prevents cardiac aging associated with improved protein homeostasis in the heart.Aging as a substrate of heart failure.Aging takes a toll on many essential biological systems and functions, and the risk of heart failure increases with age along with other diseases such as cancer and Alzheimer's. The mechanisms through which aging contributes to heart failure remain unclear, however, and the prognosis is poor for many elderly patients with impaired cardiovascular function. Complex interactions of the cardiovascular aging process with risk factors (obesity, hypertension, and atherosclerosis), comorbidities (anemia, chronic kidney disease, diabetes, and so on), and disease modifiers (sex, genes, others) contribute to the development of HF phenotype and outcome.
